The author expresses a feeling of _____ (l.____) when he recounts the long-standing connection he has to his local newspaper and the printed press in general. He first came in contact with newspapers as a child, when he used to _____ (two words, l.____) the huge bundle that was the Sunday paper, looking for the latest comic strip, which regularly resulted in minor family disputes.

Given his emotional connection to the printed press, the author is saddened by the fact that more and more newspaper employees are losing their jobs, since fewer and fewer people read the papers. This results in a drop in _____ (l.____), which in turn makes companies more reluctant to pay for newspaper ads, causing a downward spiral. The author acknowledges that newspapers are far from perfect. For instance, the _____ (two words, l.____) of some are rather obvious.

However, such imperfections are eclipsed by the amount of false information that is spread online. Since the online world offers _____ (l.____), people are much more uninhibited when it comes to spreading lies there.

If newspapers continue to dwindle away, the resulting _____ (two words, l.____) is bound to rise even further.
